Beyond Four Walls

There's a language that cities have forgotten. The language of wind moving freely through rooms. Of morning light that arrives unobstructed. Of stepping onto your balcony and seeing green, not glass and concrete walls closing in.

We believe that luxury isn't measured in how many units fit on a plot, but in how much space, air and life each home receives. That a view of trees from your bedroom window isn't an amenity-it's essential. That privacy shouldn't be a compromise you make to live in a well-connected location.

“A home where every breath is green, every corner is spacious and every moment is yours alone.”

The Difference

Walk through any new project in Gurugram and you'll notice a pattern. Towers positioned to maximize units. Balconies that face other balconies. Amenities clustered in one corner where your morning jog means navigating through evening badminton games and weekend birthday parties. This is the math of density-fitting more, not living better. We refused that math. Garden Residency is designed around a simple belief: your home should open to space, not congestion. Every residence here has green space at its back. Not a shared courtyard you glimpse from the 7th floor. Actual, accessible green that becomes an extension of your living area.

Here's what makes it different: we distributed the amenities. Your neighbor's backside might open to the swimming pool. Yours faces the meditation garden. Someone else overlooks the kids' play area. Different backs, different amenities, different experiences. Your privacy is protected because your neighbor's recreation doesn't happen in your sightline. This is low-density living as a conscious choice—we built 40% fewer units than standard practice would allow. Wider floor plates, no awkward corners, cross-ventilation that doesn't need AC for half the year. In a city racing to build taller, we chose to spread out.

“In a city of Towers, we chose to Breathe...”

Why Low-Rise Just Feels Better

Living on a low-rise floor brings back a sense of ease. You're closer to the ground-no long elevator rides, no crowded transitions-just a simple, everyday connection to your surroundings. It makes the home feel grounding in a way high-rises rarely do.

The spaces breathe better too. With more light, more airflow, and fewer families sharing the building, the atmosphere stays calmer and more personal. You notice a quiet sense of community, not because it's forced, but because there's room for it to happen naturally.

And with less to maintain, life stays uncomplicated-just the way a home should be.

“A few good neighbours can make a place feel like home.”
